

"VAN NUYS DENTIST THINKS PATIENT MIGHT SLIP AGENT HIS SCRIPT"

Early this morning, an area dentist held a press conference in the waiting room he shares with a travel agent. And it was here he explained that a longtime patient could potentially pass his script along to an agent. "I haven't asked yet," the dentist said, "but there's a chance he might if I did."

In Hollywood, the practice of slipping a script to an agent means a film student will summarize that submission, then place that synopsis inside a file cabinet. "I really want that," added the dentist, "and I think it might happen."

The story is still developing. But when the dentist was reached for comment, he replied with an automated voicemail asking us to come back to his office every six months or so, forever.
